ABSTRACT

This reference book responds to the continuing demand from students, overseas educational advisors, U.S. academic advisors, and librarians for an informal resource on grants and fellowships available to foreign nationals from public and private sector organizations. Information from about 5000 surveyed organizations focuses on 600 appropriate grants and fellowships. Six preliminary sections provide an introduction, map of the United States, and information on: the Institute of International Education; how to use the book; financial aid planning for U.S. study; and international student statistics and financial support. A map of the United States is also included. The major portion of the document consists of grant and fellowship information. Usually provided are offering organization name, grant or fellowship name, address, phone number, field of study, type of award, purpose, financial data, annual number of awards, duration of award, restrictions, eligibility, application deadline, and application procedure. Two appendices provide a list of overseas educational advising centers and a form for suggesting additional grants. Four indices provide access by organization, nationality, educational level, and field of study. (SM)

Introduction

The impetus for this book is a simple one.

Our responsibilities at the Institute of International Education include the IIE Information Center, an educational advising center and library in New York City that assists several thousand visitors to 809 United Nations Plaza each year.

The most common request is for information about financial aid for international study—both from foreign nationals wishing to study in the U.S. and U.S. nationals wishing to study abroad. The same statement applies to information requests received by other IIE offices in the U.S. and abroad—and to thousands of inquiries received by phone and letter each year.

IIE receives frequent visits from the staff of U.S. Information Service educational advising centers overseas. They, too, report that information on financial resources is most requested—and that a comprehensive reference resource would be of value in their work.

To respond to this demand, IIE surveyed some 5,000 organizations in 1989. The result is two books, Financial Resources for International Study: A Guide for U.S. Nationals, copublished by IIE and Peterson's Guides and available only from Peterson's Guides (order form at back of book), and the current volume, Funding for U.S. Study: A Guide for Foreign Nationals, available only from IIE Books.

The extensive survey for Funding for U.S. Study elicited information on some 600 grants and fellowships open to foreign nationals. IIE considers this a very solid response to a first effort, but hopes to expand the book in future editions.

The input of overseas educational advisers will be critical to strengthening this information resource. The Institute is especially interested in the suggestions of overseas advisers—and of the foreign student advisers on U.S. campuses. A form to use to bring other awards to our attention is Appendix B of this book.

Data on awards available to foreign nationals for study in the U.S. is not the easiest information to obtain. Many useful grant directories exist, but most contain relatively fragmentary information on the use of awards for international purposes.

IIE decided to compile this directory because we felt current information was much-needed and would be well-used by foreign nationals and U.S. educational advisers. We acted in the belief that a solid information resource would be of special value because the financial search was indeed so difficult for foreign nationals. The intention of this book is to ease a complex process for foreign students and their advisers by providing well-indexed, up-to-date information on the resources that are in fact available.

While many organizations listed in this book do not make large numbers of awards to foreign nationals, they will all consider highly-qualified applicants. A detailed field-of-study index, as well as an index by educational level that also includes field of study information, should be of special value in focusing the financial aid search.

As with any other difficult human endeavor, not all candidates will succeed in obtaining financial support. However, this book should make it easier for many foreign nationals to determine what is in fact available to them. If this book makes access to available funding a simpler, more direct process for foreign nationals, it will have served a highly useful goal.

IIE 1919-1989

70 years of leadership in international educational exchange

The Institute of International Education (IIE) is the largest U.S. higher educational exchange agency.

IIE builds international understanding through educational exchanges that reach nearly all the world's nations. Many IIE programs further international development goals.

A nonprofit organization with over 600 U.S. college and university members, IIE has provided information on educational exchange to higher education and the public for 70 years.

USIA Fulbright Program

The Institute assists the U.S. Information Agency (USIA) in the conduct of the graduate Fulbright Program for both U.S. and foreign students at the predoctoral level.

Foreign nationals who wish to apply for financial assistance through the Fulbright Program to study in the United States must apply through the binational Fulbright commission or designated U.S. diplomatic post in their home nation. IIE cannot accept direct applications from foreign nationals for the USIA Fulbright Program.

U.S. students enrolled in a U.S. college or university must apply through a campus Fulbright Program adviser. U.S. citizens not formally enrolled in a higher educational institution may request applicant information on USIA Fulbright Program grants from IIE's U.S. Student Programs office.

Program administration

IIE manages 200 programs which benefit approximately 10,000 men and women from nearly 150 nations each year. The Institute is an independent nonprofit agency. It organizes international projects at the request of sponsors such as the U.S. Information Agency, U.S. Agency for International Development, foundations, corporations, universities, foreign governments and international organizations.

Most IIE-administered programs are restricted to participants nominated by the sponsoring agency. Programs to which foreign candidates may apply directly, typically through cooperating agencies abroad, are listed in this book. USIA-sponsored programs such as the Fulbright Program, in which IIE plays a supportive administrative role, are listed under the heading of the U.S. Information Agency.

Purposes and participants

IIE administers international education, training and research activities to fulfill goals developed in consultation with its sponsor organizations. Purposes can vary from the institutional development of a university in an emerging nation to multinational corporate staff development, from short-term training to long-term research on world food needs. Half of those assisted are foreign students pursuing U.S. graduate degrees. The Institute also provides support services to large numbers of U.S. students and U.S. and foreign senior scholars, scientists, artists, corporate executives and community leaders each year.

Services to higher education and the community

IIE provides educational advising services worldwide that assist 200,000 individuals annually. IIE publications are standard guides to international study. IIE research reports provide a substantive basis for policy choices in the field of international exchange.

U.S. offices

U.S. offices are located in New York, the Institute's central office; Washington, DC, Chicago, Denver, Houston, and San Francisco.

Students and educators visiting New York City are encouraged to make use of the IIE International Education Information Center in planning international study. The center is located at IIE headquarters at 809 United Nations Plaza, and is open each weekday from 10 to 4 except for major holidays. The center cannot provide research assistance by phone or letter.

Overseas educational information centers

IIE overseas educational information centers are located in Bangkok, Thailand; Hong Kong; and Mexico City. They offer extensive information resources useful to foreign nationals planning study at U.S. colleges and universities. Foreign students are encouraged to visit these centers. Offices in Bangkok, Mexico City and Jakarta also serve as test administrators for the Educational Testing Service, supervising the administration of the Test of English as a Foreign Language (TOEFL) and other admissions tests in their countries.

How To Use This Book

Background information

Funding for U.S. Study: A Guide for Foreign Nationals is a reference directory to sources of financial assistance available for foreign nationals to pursue educational objectives in the United States. The book was compiled by the Institute of International Education (IIE), the largest U.S. higher educational exchange agency. The Institute is a nonprofit organization with over 600 U.S. college and university member institutions.

The book provides information on agencies that offer awards for foreign nationals to study, teach, perform research, or pursue other educational objectives in the United States. Funding for U.S. Study offers the most relevant data on some 600 fellowships, grants, travel grants, scholarships, and paid internships geared to all levels of postsecondary education and research: undergraduate, graduate, postdoctoral, adult, and professional.

Funding for U.S. Study is intended to be an information resource on financial aid available from public and private sources in the U.S. and abroad: governments, foundations, corporations, associations, research centers, libraries, and other agencies.

Foreign nationals may apply directly to these grant and fellowship programs if they meet eligibility requirements. Typically these grant programs do not require special nomination by home governments, institutions or international organizations. Programs of this type exist, but they are not the focus of this book, which is intended to identify grants and fellowships that are generally accessible to foreign nationals.

The book is not intended as a guide to financial assistance offered to international students by the admissions and financial aid offices of U.S. colleges and universities. IIE may expand the book to include such information in future editions, but will survey the needs and wishes of professional users of this book before making that decision.

Foreign students interested in current data on the financial aid of many U.S. colleges and universities as it applies to international students may wish to consult the College Board publication, The College Handbook/Index of Majors/Foreign Student Supplement, available in all U.S. Information Service educational advising centers worldwide.

Funding for U.S. Study does include grants and fellowships made available by specialized research institutions and programs affiliated with U.S. universities, typically at an advanced graduate level.

Purpose of the Book

IIE decided to prepare this directory because of continuing demand from foreign nationals and the educational advisers who assist them in planning study in the United States. There are currently over 360,000 foreign students enrolled at U.S. colleges and universities. See the chapter, "International student statistics and financial support." These students and many additional hundreds of thousands of prospective students around the world need regularly updated data on financial aid available to them.

Many general reference books on financial aid exist that are carefully compiled and frequently updated, but the data they provide on the applicability of awards for international purposes is often fragmentary. IIE hopes to make Funding for U.S. Study the comprehensive resource on financial resources for foreign nationals.

The Institute would appreciate any suggestions from users of the book that would contribute towards its improvement. Suggestions should be directed to IIE Books, 809 United Nations Plaza, New York NY 10017-3580 USA. Appendix B of this book is a form that may be used to suggest new listings of grants for inclusion in the next edition.

If the present book is well-received, IIE hopes to publish successive editions that provide the field of international education with financial aid information that is as complete, accurate and up-to-date as possible.

Using the book

The information in the award entries is based on a survey conducted from October 1988 through March 1989. Questionnaires were sent to some 5,000 U.S. and foreign government agencies, organizations, foundations, societies, corporations, U.S. colleges and universities, foreign schools and universities, arts groups, and other award-granting agencies.

IIE conducted an extensive search of financial aid literature to develop the list of organizations that received its questionnaire. The Institute's Information Center at its headquarters in New York City provides assistance in planning international study to both U.S. and foreign nationals. The Information Center has assembled the largest collection in the U.S. of published resources and files on financial aid for international study.

Approximately 3,000 grant-making organizations identified through a review of the Information Center collection were surveyed. IIE surveyed all likely financial aid sources for this book, not just the organizations specifically known to us as providing awards usable for international purposes. The intention was to make the listings as inclusive as possible, and to identify additional resources, not simply to describe already well-known resources.

In addition, IIE surveyed some 2,000 organizations active in various aspects of international exchange, international education, and international affairs. While grant-making is not the primary role of these agencies, many offer grants and fellowships as an adjunct to their other international roles.

Organizations that did not respond to an initial survey mailing in fall 1988 were again asked to respond in winter 1989, in order to make the data as complete as possible.

Most respondents returned completed questionnaires accompanied by brochures or other printed materials, giving a fairly comprehensive picture of their agency and awards. In other cases, less complete information was provided. For this reason, the listings vary in length and detail. Where possible, IIE followed up by phone or letter to obtain essential details.

IIE has tried to make the information contained in this book as accurate and useful as possible. Bear in mind, however, that information-gathering sometimes took place before award decisions for the current year were announced. For this reason, it's a good idea to use this book as a general resource for locating applicable awards. Final and full information on any award must be obtained directly from the administering agency.

To derive maximum benefit from Funding for U.S. Study: A Guide for Foreign Nationals be sure to read this section, "How to use this book," carefully. It explains how the entries are organized and the various terms used.

Awards for international educational purposes

Entry number and agency name

Each entry begins with a number used to identify it within the listing sequence and in the indexes at the back of the book.

The name of the agency that administers the award is the next item of information. Entries are arranged alphabetically by agency name.

Award title

If an agency administers more than one award, the awards are listed alphabetically by title under the agency's name.

Contact

Contact information for the agency that administers the award is given here: the name and/or title of the individual to contact, full address, phone number including foreign country and city codes, fax number, telex number, and cable address, if available. TDD (Telephonic Device for the Deaf) numbers appear in some entries.

Field of study

This heading describes the field(s) of study, research, or teaching for which this award may be used. When a scholarship or fellowship is offered in an "Unrestricted" field, this means the recipient may study any subject. Consult Index Four: Fields of Study for assistance in locating awards in your field(s) of interest and expertise. We have adapted the detailed field-of-study categories developed by the National Center for Education Statistics to classify instructional programs.

Type of award

Indicated here is whether an award is a fellowship, travel grant, grant for other specific purposes, scholarship, or internship with a stipend or salary. Other types of awards, such as accommodations or volunteer positions with room and board provided, can also be found.

Purpose

Each entry states the purpose for which the award is to be used, when that information was provided.

Financial data

Financial data includes the projected amount of support per award in 1989, and the projected total amount of support to all recipients receiving this award in 1989. Where information was not available for 1989, financial data from the most recent year (usually 1988) will appear. To be eligible for listing in Funding for U.S. Study, awards have to offer at least $500 or its equivalent in foreign currency.

Award includes

The award may include the following, singly or in combination: tuition, living expenses, international travel expenses and/or travel within the United States, dependents' expenses (which may include expenses for the spouse only or for spouse and dependent minor children), or a variety of other expenses, including those related to research, equipment, fees, books, English as a second language training, and institutional allowances. Unrestricted grants may be used in any way the recipient sees fit.

Annual number of awards

This states the total number of awards given annually, the number or percentage of these awards that typically go to foreign nationals for international use (or a simple statement that foreign nationals are eligible, in the case in which statistics could not be provided by the award sponsor), and the number of applicants in the most recent year in which the award was given.

Duration of award

This heading indicates the period of time that the award is intended to cover, followed by the date on which the award becomes effective.

Restrictions

Noted here are institutional and/or geographic restrictions that apply to the use of the award. "None" means that the award can be used anywhere the recipient chooses; sometimes the recipient can choose the location, but it must be approved by an advisory board.

Eligibility

This indicates the educational level(s) at which candidates may apply for an award. The award may be applicable to one or more of the following educational levels: postsecondary vocational/technical, university undergraduate, graduate/postgraduate, postdoctoral, and professional. Some awards have no educational eligibility requirements.

Nationality requirements may specify citizens and/or residents of one or more countries. "None" indicates that qualified nationals of any country may apply for the award.

Any restrictions in regard to the sex of candidates appear next, followed by any age limitations. Most awards are available to both men and women, but a number of women-only awards are available.

If foreign nationals already resident in the United States at the time of application are eligible for this award, it is stated here.

Any other requirements for eligibility are noted here. Often they concern marital status, ethnic backgound, membership in societies or organizations, additional educational or professional qualifications, language capabilities, restrictions as to previous contact with the host country or award-granting agency, or U.S. state residency.

Additional information

Shown here is other information not given previously in the entry that might prove important to applicants. Examples of important additional information: an award cycle that is biennial or triennial, or a requirement that applicants must be interviewed at a specific location.

Application deadline

Deadline for submission of applications and, in some cases, proposals, is indicated here.

Notification date is the date by which the agency will announce award recipients.

Application procedure

Most entries indicate that applicants should contact the administering agency for application forms and additional information.

If application forms are available from other sources, that information is noted here.

Important notice

The Institute of International Education did not attempt to evaluate the sponsor institutions and awards listed in this book. Inclusion of an award or its sponsor organization does not imply recommendation by IIE, nor does omission imply disapproval by IIE. Applications and additional information must be requested directly from the administering agency, NOT from IIE.

Financial Aid: Planning For U.S. Study

For the international student who is applying for financial aid to a U.S. college or university, the articles in this section provide advice on how to proceed.

Most of this book provides information on specific awards available from governments, foundations, associations and other organizations. This chapter offers useful overall guidance in relation to financial aid from U.S. colleges and universities. U.S. higher education is the second most important source of financial support for international students. Only family and personal funds are more important resources.

The section begins with some brief information that all students should know. This brief guidance is followed by four useful articles from Advising Quarterly on U.S. higher education financial aid.

Each article addresses the topic of college and university financial aid from a different perspective. Shelly Romoff outlines the basic steps all students must follow in applying for assistance—and emphasizes the need for guidance from experienced U.S. educational advisers. The article on graduate financial aid reviews the types of university support that are available to advanced students.

Barry Bem's article on the financial problems of international students should be read especially carefully. He makes it clear why international students must be highly realistic in their financial planning, and describes pitfalls to be avoided in organizing and funding a successful U.S. academic experience.

Finally, Norman Peterson's article discusses the recent changes in U.S. tax law as they affect the international student and scholar.

Advising Quarterly

The four Advising Quarterly articles in this section are excerpted from the magazine's winter 1989 special issue on financing higher education in the United States. Advising Quarterly is a publication of AMIDEAST, 1100 Seventeenth St NW, Washington, DC 20036. Although AMIDEAST's organizational focus is on the Middle East, Advising Quarterly has a worldwide focus. Its purpose is to bring current news about U.S. higher education to the network of overseas educational advising centers sponsored by the U.S. Information Service and other agencies. Because its articles are targeted to the information needs of these resource centers abroad, Advising Quarterly is of interest to the U.S. higher education audience that advises international students as well. Subscription information can be obtained from the address above. IIE adapted the articles excerpted here to reflect the change in audience from advising professional to international student.

A brief guide to financial planning for U.S. higher education

- U.S. higher education is expensive.

- Students should be very realistic in financial planning for U.S. study. Finding sufficient funds to cover both educational and living expenses for several years in the United States is difficult for many students.

- U.S. colleges and universities typically require detailed financial aid applications from those students requesting assistance. Students are often asked to provide certification of the accuracy of their financial statements.

- In issuing a certificate of eligibility for a student visa, U.S. higher educational institutions must certify that international students can support the costs of at least the first year of study. In some cases, students must verify for the U.S. consulate in their home country that they can support the costs of their entire period of study before a visa is granted.

- In competing for U.S. higher education financial aid, the priority given to international students varies from institution to institution. In some institutions, a certain percentage or amount of financial aid is reserved for foreign students, while in other institutions they may compete on an equal level or be given second priority to U.S. students.

- In few cases is the availability of financial assistance from U.S. institutions sufficient to meet the demand from international student applicants.

- Students must plan in advance, plan carefully and plan beyond the first year.

- Begin the financial aid search before arrival in the United States. Students must apply while still in their home country for many U.S. university awards, as well as for U.S. Government, home government and international organization awards. The U.S. Information Agency's Fulbright Program, for example, requires application through designated coordinating agencies abroad.

- The U.S. educational advising centers overseas listed in Appendix B exist to help international students plan U.S. study. Their libraries and information centers have information on available financial aid opportunities in the United States. Students should contact them at least 18 months in advance of the planned beginning of U.S. study.

- Candidates are most likely to be successful financial aid applicants if they have excellent academic background and personal qualifications. Many institutions require a demonstrated level of English language capability as measured by standard tests, in addition to other admissions examinations they may require.

- Undergraduate awards vary in size and purpose. It is not common for a student financial aid package to cover all academic and living expenses, although some exceptional students receive this level of assistance. A combination of scholarships, tuition waivers, loans and/or work may be offered.

- Graduate awards tend to be offered on the basis of a student's capability in a chosen field, rather than in relation to financial need.

- Students should know the level of support their families at home can provide while they are in the United States. As noted above, it is not common for a student financial aid package to cover all educational and living expenses. Family and personal funds are the primary source of support for the majority of international students in the United States.

- Financing U.S. higher education is not a simple or an easy process. However, over 360,000 international students currently enrolled in U.S. colleges or universities have managed to achieve their goal. To achieve the same goal, careful and realistic financial planning is a crucial means to your desired end.

"Applying for financial aid from U.S. colleges and universities: Why foreign students must plan ahead"

Shelley Romoff
Coordinator, Regional Educational Advising Consultancy, Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia

U.S. higher education is becoming increasingly expensive. At some private colleges, the cost of tuition, room and board now surpasses $15,000 each year. The costs at even the usually more affordable public universities are rising at an average annual rate of approximately 5 percent.

Meanwhile, many parts of the world are experiencing an economic slowdown. Most countries are providing financial assistance to fewer and fewer students. Lack of local funding and skyrocketing costs bring more and more international students needing financial aid.

Some financial aid programs exist from which these students could benefit. Some institutions are even starting programs specifically for foreign students. Lack of familiarity with the process of applying for financial aid has not allowed students to take maximum advantage of these programs. Advisers are the key to the process, and knowledge of financial aid resources has become essential to an adviser's job.

How overseas educational advisers can help

Being knowledgeable about the distribution of financial aid awards by U.S. colleges and universities is difficult because awards vary from school to school, from department to department, and from year to year. In addition, many higher educational institutions do not actively publicize their limited financial assistance funds, so that they will not be overwhelmed with applications, and students will not be encouraged to pin all their hopes on schools that, realistically, they cannot afford.

Students planning study in the United States are well-advised to begin by contacting the U.S. educational advising center in their home country. A list of these centers is Appendix A of this book.

Advisers at these centers maintain the continued contact with U.S. colleges and universities that is essential to helping students learn about financial aid possibilities. Contact with school representatives allows overseas advisers to stay informed about changing award opportunities, publicized and unpublicized, as well as the requirements for financial aid at particular institutions.

Overseas advisers know which institutions have a commitment to funding international education, which universities are research institutions, and how to help distinguish between schools on the basis of cost. Much of this information is not provided in reference books but must be acquired through inquiry and experience.

Even without knowing of all possible financial aid sources, advisers can help students with the process of applying for financial aid. A student who understands fully what institutions expect and look for in an application may have a better chance of receiving aid and will certainly find the process less frustrating.

Assessing the situation

It is imperative that students requiring financial assistance be very realistic in the assessment of their own ability to contribute to the cost of higher education. Students need a practical understanding of the expenses required to study in the United States.

Once the cost is determined, students must carefully evaluate their own resources and investigate any local sources of funding. Many universities prefer to award funding to students who have clearly demonstrated financial need, and they will want to see if applicants have exhausted all local sources of funding. Students who are realistic in their assessment of their own financial contribution appear more sincere and thorough in their applications.

Academic record

Students seeking financial aid must have a strong academic record. From the institution's point of view, there must be solid reasons why aid should be awarded to a particular student. In this regard, it is often valuable for the candidate to provide information on the school from which he or she graduated since, in many cases, the school's academic environment becomes an important indicator of the candidate's potential.

Letters of recommendation

Strong letters of recommendation are also important and should provide a comparison of the student to others at his or her school. Recommendations should be a serious attempt to evaluate or rank the candidate. They should state in what ways the candidate is outstanding. Letters should provide specific examples of the student's academic capabilities as well as any significant participation in extracurricular activities.

Most of all, recommendations should be believable. While recommendations are often considered more important at the graduate level, strong letters of recommendation at the undergraduate level, where candidates for admission are academically more or less the same, also provide concrete information on the student.

Application deadlines

The importance of getting applications to the college or university before the stated deadline cannot be stressed enough. Students should make an effort to submit their applications early, if at all possible. Although most institutions will not consider the application until a certain date, early applications provide some guarantee that all materials are at the university on time, giving the financial aid officer ample time to tell the student if more information is required.

Students should be aware that nearly all financial aid is awarded by the academic year, and that it is difficult to receive aid to begin in January or the summer.

When and who to ask

Students should approach the issue of financial aid on their second communication with the institution. The first letter should focus on academic concerns. This is not a problem if students begin their search process early enough.

Students should avoid just sending general letters requesting "financial aid." Instead they should present their own credentials first and then ask for specific information about the institution's financial aid programs.

Candidates for financial aid need to gain the institution's interest through their academic record. Also, letters indicating an understanding of the process of admission and the types of financial aid opportunities available (applicable grants and loans and teaching or research assistantships) may be viewed by a university as evidence of a student's maturity, organization, and level of interest, particularly if he or she is applying to graduate school.

Who to contact regarding financial aid opportunities may also be of some significance. Students will facilitate their search by contacting the most appropriate office and may well find that more information is available from some offices than from others. Undergraduate students who are uncertain of whom to contact should be directed to the college's financial aid office. Graduate students should generally contact the appropriate academic department.

Choosing Institutions

There are certain considerations that are fundamental to choosing an institution, especially when financial aid is required. Every institution looks for particular qualities, and students should apply to those institutions that match their own philosophies and interests.

Graduate students should consider the academic program above all. Institutions look first for a good academic fit, and many graduate departments offer financial aid packages based on merit. There may be little money available from sources outside the university specifically for tuition. Private funding sources usually only offer assistance for research or preparation of the dissertation.

The situation for undergraduate students is rather different. Those applicants who are outstanding will probably find a number of financial aid opportunities. But there are fewer exceptional students than simply good, solid students, and the latter will find their own ability to make a financial contribution is particularly important when they apply to study in the United States.

Students who need only 25 percent or less of the tuition and fees covered by financial aid should apply to any institution that offers the degree program they are selecting. But those students who need more than this amount (the more common situation that advisers encounter) should look specifically at America's lower-cost institutions or to those that have financial aid programs designed for foreign students. These tend to be schools with a strong commitment to funding international education and are often private liberal arts colleges or public institutions that offer students either in-state tuition or tuition waivers.

Variation in the cost of living from region to region is another factor that should be considered when seeking the least expensive option.

Successful application to a U.S. higher educational institution requires a great deal of effort. Admission with financial aid is an even more challenging task. In order to be prepared and informed, students need assistance and information that cannot be found in reference books. Advisers are vital for providing not only basic information on application procedures and requirements but the more subtle guidance students need as well.

Lower-cost options

Everyone knows that higher education in the United States is very expensive. However, there are some ways to reduce cost without sacrificing quality.

- If your goal is to obtain a bachelor's degree, consider completing the first two years of your education at a lower-cost community or junior college.
- Plan to go to school year round, reducing the total length of time and thus your living expenses.
- Consider the cost-of-living in the institution's area. Living expenses can vary greatly among large cities, and smaller towns may be even cheaper.
- Take tests such as CLEP and PEP to receive college credit.
- Consider a lower-cost college. Use resources such as the College Board's Foreign Student Supplement to compare tuition costs.

"Graduate financial aid from U.S. universities: What are the options?"

Advising Quarterly

There are several alternative sources

Teaching assistantships are the most common form of financial assistance. They are prevalent in all universities. Foreign students may not be considered for the positions that are available until after one or two semesters on the U.S. campus. All teaching assistants are expected to show proven capability in their graduate field. They may be asked to teach sections of a large undergraduate course or to lead seminars or perform other teaching functions. In all cases, fluency in spoken English is a virtual necessity.

The assistantship will provide a stipend and often will include full or partial tuition support as well.

Research assistantships provide a similar type of financial support. They are most available at research-intensive universities, of which there are about 150 in the United States.

A working definition of a "research-intensive university": a university with a full range of programs (bachelor's, master's, and doctoral), where there is an emphasis on research by the institution, and which receives more than $12 million in federal funds.

At these institutions, there are often a considerable number of research assistantships. As with teaching assistantships, they are generally not given to students their first year. Availability of research assistantships varies, depending on the overall level of the institution's research funding, academic discipline, the match between current research projects and the student's needs and interests, and other factors. Duties in support of a senior faculty member's research project may vary considerably.

Fellowships in support of tuition and living costs may be given to highly-qualified fulltime students. Fellowships are awarded for the full academic year, for dissertations, for travel, or for summer study. They are very competitive and based primarily on outstanding academic performance.

Campus employment is another possibility after the first year. This is the area of financial assistance that has been increasing the most. Many people believe campus employment will not be at all related to one's academic training. In fact, students serve as bibliographers, programmers, staff research associates, and lab assistants. Such employment is often related to the person's academic interest. Highest earnings (for campus employees) are in the fields where research assistantships and teaching assistantships are not as common. These are education, engineering, social sciences, public health and nursing.

Nonresident tuition waivers, or nonresident tuition remissions are another form of graduate financial aid. At some institutions, tuition is waived as a part of the financial aid package that includes a teaching or research assistantship or fellowship. At other institutions, tuition waivers are awarded separately.

What are current trends in graduate financial assistance?

Aid is increasing slightly in dollars, but these dollars do not buy as much because costs are increasing more rapidly.

In the past two years, there has been an approximately two percent increase nationally in various forms of financial assistance. The inflation rate for higher education has been several times that in recent years.

The physical and biological sciences have the most graduate financial aid to offer, while the social sciences have less to offer and professional schools have the least to offer in aid. Professional schools are unlikely to offer foreign students any form of financial assistance.

Aid is generally more available at the doctoral (Ph.D.) level than for the master's degree.

How does a student go about finding about financial aid from a U.S. graduate department?

The best approach is the direct approach. Write the department. While information from previous years on the numbers of assistantships offered is helpful, research interests and funding change over time. Contact the departments of interest to you for the most current information.

In the case that financial assistance is not available in a given year, a university may reconsider a student's application the following year or term. However, this is not an automatic procedure. The student must request a second opportunity to be considered, and often must complete a new application.

What overall guidance is helpful to the international student applying to a U.S. graduate department?

Students should prepare applications that are well-written and clear, with all documents enclosed. The application must be submitted on time. Good letters of recommendation—not just formal polite ones, but letters that reflect that the person making the recommendation knows the student—are genuinely helpful.

It is especially important that students apply to more than their first or second choice of institution. There are many excellent graduate departments at U.S. universities, not all of them well-known abroad. The most famous are also the most competitive in terms of the availability of financial aid. An international student may be as well-served by the academic offerings of a less-famous institution, with considerably greater likelihood of receiving some form of financial assistance.

In this regard, students should also consider that departments have different specialties. If a candidate is applying to four or five different schools, it would be worthwhile to take time to read the graduate catalogs of those institutions. The student can then tailor the application's statement of purpose to fit the expertise that a specific department's faculty has to offer.

Most assistantships and other awards are merit-based. They are based on academic performance and promise as a researcher and educator. There is little need-based financial assistance today. A prospective teaching or research assistant is considered as a scholar first and a needy or non-needy person second.

Depending on ranking in the group of graduate students in a department, an international student will receive an assistantship—or not. Those who do very well academically, have good faculty support, and have interests that relate to the research grants that are available will be given assistantships.

An often overlooked consideration is that the cost of living varies greatly from one university to another, depending upon geographic location and urban or rural setting. Students should make an effort to find out about the the cost of living in areas that interest them in relation to possible financial aid, as the same level of assistance may be much more generous in, for example, a rural area than in Los Angeles or New York City.

Students typically have to apply for renewal of teaching and research assistantships every year. Very few university departments offer a total financial assistance package covering the several years of work required to earn a doctorate. In most departments, there is no guarantee that financial assistance will continue throughout one's studies. However, once a person is a student in that department, it typically makes sense for the university to try—if the student is meritorious—to see him or her through to the advanced degree. It is a good use of resources to sustain a student through to a degree. However, students should not assume that the process is therefore automatic.

Graduate students sometimes overlook the possibility of assistantships from departments that are not their own. Such assistantships are hard to arrange before arrival on a U.S. campus. However, after arriving in the United States, students can make their capabilities known. Many international students teach in foreign language departments.

A final observation on financial assistance as it relates to families: Financial aid is never given to assist a student in supporting his or her dependents. If a student wants to be accompanied by family, the student should nonetheless spend at least the first six months in the United States alone while adjusting to the environment and experiencing the cost of living at firsthand. The student will then be much better able to evaluate whether dependents will prove to be an insuperable economic burden.

"How to avoid the most common financial problems of international students"

Barry Bem
Director, International Student Services, Howard University

Financial difficulties are undoubtedly the most common, persistent problems that international students face during their stay in the United States.

Students who have full and continuing sponsorship from private or public sources can sail through their education without worrying about finances. However, many students—perhaps the majority—face financial problems at some time or another and must seek alternative ways to continue their studies.

International student advisers and others on campus who talk to international students on a daily basis have seen a whole spectrum of problems—from temporary situations in which short-term emergency loans are enough to solve a student's problems to situations in which students in essence become destitute.

If a student depends on one source of funds—parents or a scholarship, for example—and something suddenly happens to that source, the student's entire life is affected: tuition due the university, books needed for classes, warm clothing during the winter months, rent, food and transportation to and from school. Whether or not a student can cope with a difficult situation is an individual matter and varies greatly from student to student depending on background, severity of the problem, and so on.

Advisers in the United States who see the many difficulties that students face when they do not have adequate funds consider these very serious questions and are many times at a loss as to what to do. While they are quite willing to work with students who face problems, they lament the fact that many problems could have been anticipated before the students arrived.

Don't come to the United States without adequate funding

An example of extreme financial difficulty involved a student whose government put such restrictions on sending money abroad that the student did not receive any funds from home for more than a year. The U.S. university in which the student was enrolled would not allow him to continue for more than a semester without payment of tuition, so he had to drop out of school. That in itself caused immigration complications since he was required to be in school every semester to maintain his immigration visa status.

After four months of not paying rent, he was evicted from his apartment, and many of his belongings disappeared after being put on the street. He worked occasionally but had to do so illegally because he did not have a work permit, and because of that and his unkempt appearance he had difficulty finding anyone to employ him.

He attempted to live in the engineering school at the university until he was discovered in the middle of the night and evicted from the building. All these problems caused such stress that he began to exhibit signs of pyschological disturbance and was picked up by city police and put in the city's mental hospital.

When he was released he was turned over to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which detained him for weeks pending a court hearing. He was eventually deported to his country, but his remaining belongings were lost somewhere in the immigration detention system.

This hardly sounds like a successful experience in international education! It is admittedly an extreme case. The point: the financial problem was the source of all other problems. Every time someone searched for a solution, there was no way to escape the financial root of the student's situation.

Very few students experience such extreme problems, but many face less harsh variations on this case.

Why do students face most financial difficulties? What do students need to know to avoid these problems from the beginning? Some common problems—and the ways to avoid them—are listed below.

Genuine change in circumstances

In most of these cases, the student had adequate financial support when he or she arrived in the United States, but something happened to change that situation, perhaps one of the following difficulties:

- Economic problems in the home country forced the government to devalue the currency. Now the sponsor must come up with more money in the country's currency to buy the same number of dollars.

- Because of economic problems, the government will now allow only a certain amount of money to be sent abroad to each student—say $9,000—and that is not enough to cover the student's expenses.

- The student had a scholarship to study in the United States but for any one of several reasons the scholarship has been reduced or cancelled entirely.

- The student's sponsor has died or suffered a business reversal that affects the amount of money that can be sent to the student.

- Family circumstances have changed: a sibling is now entering a university and also needs financial support or a member of the family is ill and needs medical attention.

- The student has become ill or has had an accident not entirely covered by medical insurance and has had to use money that was supposed to be used for tuition or living expenses to pay medical bills.

These are all very real situations that students face and that they could not have anticipated before arriving in the United States. However, careful planning from the beginning by students to meet the costs for the entire period of stay may minimize the effects of a change in circumstance as well as making it easier to avoid some of the following problems.

Inadequate support from the beginning

In many instances, international student advisers who talk to students with financial difficulties discover that the student may not have had adequate financial support even before arriving in the United States.

Students must show evidence of support to the university in order to receive an immigration form and to the U.S. embassy in order to receive a visa. Often that support takes the form of a signed statement from a sponsor. In some instances, advisers later learn that the sponsor has signed the statement simply to help the student with immigration matters but without the intention of actually supplying the level of support indicated in the statement.

The sponsor and the student may hope that after arriving in the United States the student will be able to find some alternative way of financing his or her stay. This puts the student in a very precarious situation!

A student cannot obtain an off-campus work permit during the first year, and there is no assurance of a permit after that. The student's own college or university may have some financial aid available, including parttime jobs, but the student must compete against all other students for any kind of aid.

The point is that there may be some alternative sources of aid available, but the student has absolutely no certainty of obtaining funds from any of them. If the student comes to the United States without a sound financial base, he or she will feel financial pressure from the very beginning, and that can affect his or her academic work and overall psychological state from the first day.

Miscalculating the cost of education

People who have never been to the United States sometimes cannot believe the estimated costs that colleges and universities quote. It is difficult to conceptualize the need for a seemingly very large amount of money, especially in countries where living costs are much lower than in the United States.

If a university estimates, for example, that students will need $15,000 for each twelve-month period to cover all expenses, and students translate that amount into their own currency, they may think it impossible to need so much money. The amount may be more than enough to live extremely well at home, leading students and sponsors to believe that students will never need so much money in the United States.

Students may also believe that they can simple economize in the United States and get by on much less money. Then they arrive and discover that $15,000 does not stretch very far.

When universities quote estimated costs of living, it is usually based on surveys of students' actual expenses and thus reflects quite accurately the necessary amount.

Only the first year of funding is secured

Students often discover that the university and the U.S. embassy are especially concerned about the first year's funds. Students are supposed to show good evidence of the first year's financing and a reasonable expectation of funding after that.

Unfortunately, some students, therefore, only worry about the first year and hope that something will come their way afterwards—a scholarship, a work permit, or a new sponsor. Students may have heard from other students that alternative sources of funding exist and thus may be lulled into thinking that financing an education after the first year will not present problems.

For those students who do find new sources of funds, of course, this strategy works. However, it is very rare to find one source that will provide all necessary funds, and frequently students will come up with only partial funding after the first year. The gap between what is needed and what is available often causes considerable difficulty.

Expectation of sending money home

If students are supporting families—wives, children, brothers and sisters at home—and have the opportunity to study in the United States, they may have to continue providing family support. Even if students have full sponsorship, it is very unrealistic to expect them to send money to their families.

Scholarships and other forms of sponsorship are usually based on living costs, and students typically need all the funds to maintain themselves in the United States. If they try to send part of each month's stipend back home, they often experience a shortage of funds for their own living expenses. If students do not have a full sponsorship upon arrival, the resulting financial problems may be even greater.

Conveying the financial realities

What do these tales of financial difficulties mean for international students? People who work with students on a daily basis tend to have reached the conclusion that if a student does not have adequate financial support, he or she should not come to the United States to study.

It is a conclusion that students and their families do not want to hear and one that they find difficult to accept.

How does one bring a sense of economic reality to students when they are thinking of studying in the United States? If a student has dreamed of obtaining a university degree or training in some field and the opportunity to fulfill that dream presents itself, inadequate financial resources are not likely to keep the student at home.

Students should, nonetheless, be discouraged from saying, "Something will turn up later," "I'll simply make the sacrifices necessary," "I will just need to economize and spend my money carefully," "Other people have managed somehow and so will I," "People in the United States are so rich that I will surely findn someone to sponsor me," or "People will undoubtedly want to help a poor student from abroad."

Careful financial planning and budgeting is crucial to the achievement of your educational goal. A realistic plan may make the difference between a productive U.S. academic experience—or a return home without a longed-for academic degree.

"Exchange Program Scholarships and the New Tax Law"

Norman Peterson
Executive Secretary, Liaison Group for International Educational Exchange

U.S. policy regarding the taxation of scholarships and fellowships was fundamentally changed by the Tax Reform Act of 1986. Before passage of this landmark legislation (Public Law 99-154) many scholarships were not taxable at all, but now many are fully taxable and almost all are at least partially subject to taxation. (It is important to note that the changes made by the Tax Reform Act of 1986 do not apply to scholarships awarded before August 17, 1986. This includes multiple-year awards if the original award notice included a firm commitment beyond the initial academic period of the scholarship. Prior law applies to awards made before the above date.)

Special problems for international student and scholar exchange participants have resulted because of the complicated and sometimes disadvantageous tax requirements that apply only to foreign taxpayers. There has been considerable confusion on the part of those administering international educational exchange programs, particularly among those located abroad who work on exchanges with the United States.

Degree vs. nondegree

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 ended the complete tax exclusion for scholarships to students who are degree candidates, making substantial portions of their awards taxable. The act also eliminated the existing partial exclusion for awards to those who are not degree candidates.

The distinction between a degree candiate and a nondegree candidate is based on a special definition included in the act. Under this legislation, a student is a degree candidate if enrolled on a fulltime or parttime basis at an accredited educational institution authorized by law to provide an educational program that is "acceptable for full credit towards a bachelor's or higher degree, or offers a programs of training to prepare students for gainful employment in a recognized occupation."

Thus, the nature of the institution and the educational program, rather than the institutional definition of a degree candidate, are the major criteria in determining whether a student is eligible for the tax benefits granted to degree candidates. This definition is beneficial to foreign students who are not formally considered degree candidates but who are enrolled in courses that could be aplied to a degree program at their host institution or elsewhere.

In the case of degree candidates, the new law limits the portion of scholarships not subject to taxation to amounts used for "qualified tuition and related expenses" (related expenses include required items such as books, lab fees and equipment). Portions of grants provided for room, board, travel and incidental expenses are not considered related expenses and are not excludable from taxable income. Regulations were published by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) clarifying these distinctions in the Federal Register, Vol. 53, No. 111, p. 12,688.

In the case of those who are not degree candidates, the entire award is taxable.

What does a scholarship include?

The law defines scholarships broadly, including any amounts paid to an individual for study or research, as well as benefits such as travel tickets and tuition waivers or fee reductions that are not paid by the recipient but which decrease the cost of the educational program. However, amounts paid to relatives, friends, or other individuals are not considered scholarships "if motivated by family or philanthropic considerations," and are therefore, not taxable. Educational loans are also not taxable when provided, though they become subject to tax law later if the loan is forgiven.

Slightly different rules apply if the scholarship or fellowship is tied to performing specific services, such as the duties of teaching assistants (TAs) or research assistants (RAs). Such scholarships are considered "compensation for services," and are fully taxable. However, tuition waivers or reductions (sometimes called "remissions") given to graduate TAs and RAs are fully excludable from taxation as long as the student receives reasonable compensation for the services performed in the form taxable cash payments.

Nonresident alien tax status

A fundamental distinction is built into U.S. tax law between "resident aliens" and "nonresident aliens."

Resident aliens are subject to the same tax rules as U.S. citizens. They must pay taxes on all income, whether the income is from U.S. or foreign sources, and they follow the same rules in computing their taxes.

Nonresident aliens pay taxes only on what is determined to be "U.S. source income." Foreign students on F-1 or J-1 visas are nonresident aliens for the first five calendar years of their U.S. studies, and foreign teachers and trainees on J-1 visas are nonresident aliens for two calendar years (at the end of these periods, a complicated "substantial presence test" determines the tax status of the individual).

For foreign taxpayers who earn substantial income outside the United States, nonresident status is advantageous. On the other hand, nonresident aliens are not entitled to the "standard deduction," which allows citizens and resident aliens to reduce their income by a specified amount ($3,000 for 1988) before computing their taxes. Nonresident aliens are also limited to one "personal exemption" ($1,950 for 1988), whereas citizens and residents may be entitled to several such exemptions based on the number of their dependents. In fact, the IRS has even indicated that the one exemption available to nonresident aliens should be prorated based on days present in the United States. Since foreign students and scholars can only claim one prorated exemption, they are taxed on a larger percentage of their scholarships than are U.S. citzens or U.S. permanent residents.

Because foreign students and scholars are taxed differently than citizens and residents, they should seek professional advice concerning tax calculation rather than relying on the word of friends and colleagues.

Withholding requirements

Withholding — which means requiring that a portion of money paid to someone be withheld and remitted directly to the federal government as a payment towards the person's tax liability — is not generally required for scholarships awarded to U.S. citizens and permanent residents. This is, however, not the case for foreign students who are on (nonimmigrant) F-1, J-1 and M-1 visas. A portion of grants made to those recipients must be withheld by the sponsor and paid directly to the IRS. If any of this money is not owed in taxes, the individual can request a refund when filing his or her tax return. The law imposes penalties on funding organizations that fail to comply with withholding requirements.

When the Tax Reform Act was passed, scholarships to nonresident alien degree candidates became subject to 14 percent withholding, while awards to nondegree candidates became subject to 30 percent withholding. These flat rates applied to all taxable portions of awards.

The Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act subsequently lowered the required withholding rate from 30 percent to 14 percent for most nondegree candidates. To qualify for this withholding reduction, recipients must:

- be an F-1, J-1 or M-1 visa holder;
- receive their award for study, training or research in the United States and;
- receive the award from the U.S. government, a state, possession or political subdivision of the United States, a foreign government, an international organization, a Fulbright commission, or a 501(c)(3) organization.

Unfortunately, the provision does not apply to lecturers, and withholding rates for them remain at 30 percent. Lecturers should consider filing W-4 forms as discussed below as a means to reduce withholding.

The IRS now offers the option to adjust these fixed withholding levels. Responding to concerns of the Council for International Exchange of Scholars, the U.S. Information Agency, and other organizations, the procedure can be used to adjust withholding to more closely approximate the actual tax liability of a foreign scholarship student. This new procedure (Revenue Procedure 88-24) requires the recipient to complete IRS form W-4 following special instructions. The scholarship sponsor uses the completed form as the basis to modify the withholding rate on the individual's scholarship. The procedure is optional, both for the program sponsor and the scholarship recipient. Program sponsors are urged to carefully study the procedure before putting it to use because it is somewhat complicated. Additional information about the procedure is available from the IRS.

Foreign source income

As mentioned above, nonresident aliens are only subject to tax on U.S. source income, so the distinction between foreign source and U.S. source income is of great importance.

Basic guidelines for sourcing scholarships have been changed by the Internal Revenue Service. Prior to this change, scholarships from foreign sources were treated like compensation for services income and were considered to be taxable U.S. source income. Through Revenue Ruling 89-67, the IRS reversed this policy, ruling that foreign donor awards should generally be treated as foreign source income which is not subject to taxation. While a very welcome change of policy for the large number of sponsored participants coming to the United States for educational programs, the ruling also had the effect of subjecting funds paid by U.S. organizations for educational programs abroad for non-U.S. residents as taxable income. The ruling also left certain questions unanswered about sourcing scholarships from hybrid binational organizations.

Tax treaties

Taxation treaties between the United States and other nations add another dimension to this complex situation. Although few generalizations can be made about the impact of tax treaties on scholarship taxation, several points should be kept in mind. Bilateral tax treaties, where applicable, do generally override the provisions of tax policy discussed above. Furthermore, most tax treaties include provisions to deal with grants for educational activities. If a scholarship is exempt from tax under a treaty, it is not subject to withholding requirements either. However, the details vary greatly from one treaty to the next. For this reason, it is important that scholarship organizations find out if a tax treaty is in effect between the United States and the recipient's country. If a treaty exists, its provisions should be carefully examined, and information on the treaty provisions should be carefully examined, and information on the treaty provisions should be provided to participants before they go to the United States.

Tax treaties are summarized in IRS Publication 515, "Withholding of Tax on Nonresident Aliens and Foreign Corporations," available free of charge by writing to Forms Distribution Center, P.O. Box 25866, Richmond, VA 23289.

International Student Statistics and Financial Support

The following paragraphs provide basic facts about international student enrollment at U.S. colleges and universities—and sources of financial support. Statistics are from Open Doors 1988/89, IIE's publication of the annual census of foreign students in the United States. The Institute of International Education conducts this annual survey with grant support from the U.S. Information Agency. Over 99 percent of U.S. accredited colleges and universities provide information on their international student enrollment in response to the survey.

Asian students were more than 50 percent of the U.S. international student population for the first time in the 1987/88 academic year, and their proportion of the total continued to grow in 1988/89. The total number of international students reached an all-time high of 366,354 in 1988/89.

For the first time Chinese students were the largest single group, numbering 29,040 students enrolled for academic credit at U.S. higher educational institutions. Other leading places of origin were Taiwan, Japan, India and the Republic of Korea. Nine of the ten leading places of origin were in Asia.

According to Dr. William Cummings of Harvard University, in a report published last year, most Asian nations currently sending large numbers of students to the United States have considerable capacity to increase the volume of students they send, given their large populations and the size and quality of their secondary school systems. Many of these countries are also actively engaged in international trade with the United States, have large immigrant populations in the United States, and strong domestic economies.

Growth in Asian enrollment has been in contrast to declines in students from Africa and the Middle East. African enrollment declined for the seventh consecutive year and Middle Eastern enrollment declined for the eighth year. Student numbers from Latin America, North America and Oceania remained relatively stable, while the number from Europe grew substantially.

A significant trend: the increasing proportion of international students in graduate study in the United States, a major shift driven by the increased predominance of Asian students. The number of foreign graduate students (165,380) exceeded the number of undergraduates at four-year institutions by over 33,000 students in 1988/89 a continuation of a three-year trend that reversed the pattern of the preceding two decades.

Foreign student enrollment at two-year institutions remained relatively stable at 40,570, but the numbers in intensive English language training and in practical training at U.S. colleges and universities displayed notable growth. Practical training has become a useful alternative to long-term degree programs for some students, given the expense of U.S. higher education, although the growth in graduate enrollment indicates that many students still find advanced education in the U.S. an affordable and attractive alternative.

Total foreign students at the Ph.D. level numbered 53,900, a 50 percent increase in just three years. Enrollment in master's degree programs has also grown substantially to 78,830, nearly a 10 percent increase over the previous year.

Engineering, science and management-related fields together attracted almost 60 percent of all international students, as they have for a number of years. Engineering, the perennial leading field of study, was the major field of 20 percent, but is gradually being overtaken by business and management at 19 percent, followed by math and computer sciences (10 percent), and physical and life sciences (8.5 percent). Mathematics and computer sciences have also shown steady growth in enrollment over a number of year.

California continued to be leading state in 1988/89 in terms of total international student enrollment, followed by New York, Texas, Massachusetts and Florida. With 5,100 international students, Miami-Dade continued to report the largest enrollment of any U.S. college or university, followed by the University of Southern California, the University of Texas at Austin, Boston University and the University of Wisconsin at Madison. Just 84 institutions with 1,000 or more international students accounted for 41 percent of the national total of 366,354 students in 1988/89. However, some 2,521 of the 2,904 accredited U.S. colleges and universities reported international student enrollment, an indication of their widespread distribution in U.S. higher education, in which they constitute just under 3 percent of total enrollment.

Sources of support

Roughly two-thirds (63 percent) of all foreign students were funded primarily from personal or family sources in 1988/89. Since nearly 8 percent of students received their major funding from their home governments, the total whose primary source of support was outside the United States approached three-quarters of all international students—given that most personal and family funds originated in the home country as well.

The most significant U.S. source of funds was U.S. colleges and universities, which provided primary funding to nearly 18 percent of international students. U.S. private sponsors (nonprofit organizations, foundations, corporations and a a variety of other agencies) provided the largest portion of support for over 3 percent, while the U.S. government acted as primary source of support for 2.4 percent.

Funding from U.S. colleges and universities increased in terms of the percentage of students who received their major funding from this source. Support from U.S. higher education increased for the fifth consecutive year, but the rate of expansion is slowing.

Students in two-year colleges relied particularly heavily on personal and family funds, with 86 percent identifying these sources as their major funding. Less than 1 percent of two-year students received primary assistance from their U.S. college, while 20 percent of students enrolled in four-year undergraduate institutions received their primary support from this source. Some 59 percent of international students in four-year colleges received primary support from personal/family funds. Home goverrnments also provided support to a much higher percentage of students enrolled in four-year than in two-year institutions.

Map Of The United States Of America

The map on the following pages shows the geographic location of the 50 states of the United States of America.

The states are identified by their two-letter U.S. Post Office abbreviations, for two reasons:

- Two-letter U.S. Post Office abbreviations are used consistently throughout this book to identify states as part of addresses, as is typically done in the United States.
- The two-letter U.S. Post Office abbreviations are more legible on a small map.

Appendix A
Overseas Educational Advising Centers

Educational advising centers that provide information on U.S. higher education are located in most of the world's nations. The U.S. Information Service (USIS) offices, Fulbright commissions, AMIDEAST and IIE offices, and other organizations listed below offer students and professionals up-to-date guidance on application to the U.S. Information Agency (USIA) Fulbright Program and on other grant and fellowship programs. Office hours vary, so it is best to contact the center before visiting.

When several advising centers are located in one country, the primary center is listed first. When the mailing address and the street address are the same, only one address is listed. When an advising center has a mailing address that is different from its street address, the mailing address is listed first, followed by the street address (Office:). The telephone number in all cases is the in-country number without country and city codes.

The advising center list is published with the gracious permission of the College Board. Acting for the National Liaison Committee on Foreign Student Admissions, composed of the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Admissions Officers, College Board, Council of Graduate Schools, Institute of International Education and the National Association for Foreign Student Affairs, the Board annually publishes the Directory of Overseas Educational Advising Centers. Data below is taken from the 1989/90 edition.

This annual publication is available for purchase to U.S. universities and others who need to provide information to overseas advising centers. Contact College Board Publications, Box 886, New York, NY 10101, for current price and order information (telephone orders not accepted). A computer diskette version is also available to universities. Contact the College Board Office of International Education at (202) 332-1480 for further information in regard to the diskette version.

Index Two: Nationality

This index provides a guide to awards intended to assist individuals from a specific country (e.g., Argentina, France), geographical area (e.g., Asia, Middle East) or group of nations (e.g., Developing Nations, European Economic Community). Awards with an area studies focus are also included in this index (e.g., awards that focus on Japanese Studies are indexed under Japan). Remember that approximately half of the awards in this book are unrestricted in terms of nationality of the applicant. A 'nationality unrestricted' category of that length would be of little use in an index, so it has been omitted here. Use the indexes on Educational Level (Index Three) and Fields of Study (Index Four) to identify the awards without nationality restrictions that are most appropriate to you. Awards with no nationality restrictions are NOT indexed below. The numbers following the names of countries below are award entry numbers. They are not page numbers.

FUNDING FOR U. S. STUDY

A resource for foreign nationals on opportunities for financial assistance

Each year over 360,000 foreign students are enrolled at U.S. colleges and universities. This book responds to the continuing demand from students, overseas educational advisers, U. S. academic advisers and librarians for an information resource on grants and fellowships available to foreign nationals from public and private sector organizations.

FUNDING FOR U. S. STUDY is a 600-entry reference book to grants, sholarships, fellowships, and paid internships. The sponsors of all awards accept applications from foreign nationals, and a substantial number of awards are specifically intended for international use. The publication covers awards in all fields and at all higher educational levels, undergraduate, posdoctoral and professional.

Sponsors are U. S. and foreign governments, educational associations, libraries, research centers, foundations, corporations and other organizations. HE did not seek to gather data on financial and offered directly by U. S. colleges and universities to admitted foreign students for this book.

Award descriptions include:

- Contact address, phone, fax, telex, cable
- Purpose of award
- Amount of award
- Academic level
- Eligibility and restrictions
- How to apply

HE has included data of special value to foreign nationals and their educational advisers, including number of awards made specifically to foreign nationals as well as to the overall applicant group, nationality requirements, and whether foreign nationals already resident in the U. S. may apply .

Entries are arranged alphabetically by sponsor organization , and indexed by:

- Field of study
- Educational level
- National world regional focus
- Sponsor

An introductory section provides guidance on how to use the book.

A nonprofit organization that build international understanding through educational exchanges that reach nearly all the world's nations, the Institute of International Education has published guides to international study for seventy years. Over 600 U.S. colleges and universities are HE member institutions.
